It will cost employers far less to pay the small fine for not providing insurance than to provide insurance, which drives the CBO's estimate of at least 7 million people losing insurance coverage. It will cost individuals far less to pay the small fine for not buying insurance than to buy coverage. People also have a second incentive not to buy health insurance. Under Obamacare, they can't be denied coverage for pre-existing conditions – so they don't need to buy insurance until they get sick.
